

Higher Standards- Higher Education

Most students in High School think “high standards mean more work.” My point of view is a little different. Think about going in to have surgery. You want your surgeon to have as many years’ experience as possible while also being trained under the highest standards. This is so you feel comfortable and confident that he or she will do their job to the best of their ability. Higher standards mean higher education. The students that are in school now are the future of our community. The harder they are pushed to learn the better our community will be. A student that is not pushed hard enough in high school will have a harder time after graduation than one that had to work hard to receive a diploma. For example a student that went throughout high school with low standards will have to work a lot harder in college because they will not be used to the work load that will be given to them because they were not pushed prior to college. The student that was pushed to be the best that they could be in high school will be better off throughout the rest of their life. I think that in our school system we are not pushed hard enough. Personally, I have gone through the last four years and have not had to try as hard as I feel like I should have had to. Although I feel that if we changed the standards and made them higher, it would be more stressful for the teachers to get all of the information in before the end of the semester to be tested on. If we has school all year long or if we has the same class for the entire school year it would be easier on both the teachers to teach the information and the students to receive and understand everything that they need to learn.
